

Viable flux states in metabolic networks: a statistical physics perspective

Andrea De Martino

We will review some recent work on the analysis of metabolic networks from a statistical physics viewpoint, integrating structural and dynamical ingredients, focusing in particular on predicting susceptible directions in flux space and response to perturbations. Biological focus will be set on E.coli and human red blood cells as model systems.