

Abstract

When a Brownian object interacts with non-interacting gas particles under non-equilibrium conditions, the energy dissipation associated to the Brownian motion causes an additional force on the object as a "momentum transfer deficit". This principle is demonstrated first by a new non-equilibrium stationary state model and then applied to several known models such as adiabatic piston for which simple explanation has been lacking.